The boogeyman, a short story by Stephen King, is about how children's lack of reality sense and their vivid imagination let them see things adults never could. The main character, Lester Billings, is told by the main character's children, who can see a monster—a so-called boogeyman. The boogeyman story was first published in March 1973 in Cavalier magazine and later included in King's 1978 short story collection Night Shift. The story takes place in a psychiatrist's office where a man comes to talk about the murders of his three young children, driven by fear. King illustrates how fear can make one crazy in this short story, and the boogeyman gives the impression of fear. The story's theme is fear, and it demonstrates how fear can drive a person mad. It has been adapted into a horror movie by Fox Studios.
